

Gandhian discourse on women & its impact on Indian liberation Movement through the lens of semiotics

Vinay Kumar Hind

Research scholar, Department of Medieval History, CMP Degree College, University of Allahabad, Allahabad, Uttar Pradesh, India

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.66856/ijssh.2026.8.1.7139>

Abstract

This paper is an attempt to understand Mr. Gandhi's philosophical framework on women's empowerment and gender equality which was revolutionary for that time, which continues to inspire the feminine movement in India later on. Through his writings and activism, this paper also tries to emphasize the role of semiotics in this discourse through which Gandhi challenged traditional chauvinistic norms, advocating for women's education, equal rights, and opportunities. Gandhi's emphasis on women's education was a cornerstone of his discourse, as evident in his writings in Young India (1919-1932) and Harijan (1933-1948). He supported social reforms like the abolition of child marriage, dowry system, and advocated for women's property rights. Associates like Kasturba Gandhi, Sarojini Naidu, Kamala Devi Chattopadhyay, and Mridula Sarabhai influenced Gandhi's thoughts on women's empowerment. His concept of non-violence and ahimsa recognized women as natural practitioners, instrumental in effecting social change. His discourse on women's empowerment played a pivotal role in the Indian National Movement. He challenged traditional patriarchal norms and stereotypes that viewed women as weak and subordinate to men. Instead, he recognized women's strength and agency, and sought to empower them to take an active part in shaping India's future. Gandhi believed women were strong in character, steadfastness, and endurance, and saw them as the embodiment of sacrifice and nonviolence. He encouraged women to participate in the movement, and many women, including Kasturba Gandhi, Sarojini Naidu, and Kamala Devi Chattopadhyay, played key roles in the fight for independence. His approach to empowering women was multifaceted, focusing on promoting their economic, social, and political participation in the movement. By challenging traditional Androcentric norms, Gandhi aimed to redefine women's roles in Indian society, recognizing their potential as agents of change.

Keywords: Gandhi, women's empowerment, gender equality, non-violence, Indian National Movement, feminism, symbolism

Introduction

Mahatma Gandhi's ideology played a pivotal role in shaping the Indian liberation movement, with a distinct emphasis on women's participation. Gandhi envisioned women as embodiments of moral strength, virtue, and sacrifice, leveraging their natural nurturing qualities for non-violent resistance. By emphasizing women's roles in peaceful protests and civil disobedience, Gandhi empowered them to participate in public life while challenging patriarchal norms.

Gandhi skilfully used symbols and semiotic strategies to mobilize women. He invoked mythological figures like Sita and Draupadi, symbolizing female strength, moral courage, and resilience. The spinning wheel (Charkha) became a powerful symbol of women's economic independence and contribution to the Swadeshi movement. These symbols not only legitimized women's entry into the political sphere but also created a sense of shared identity and purpose. Notable women like Aruna Asaf Ali, Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, Usha Mehta, and Sarojini Naidu actively contributed to the movement, embodying Gandhi's ideals. Kasturba Gandhi, Mahatma Gandhi's wife, also played a significant role in the freedom struggle.

Gandhi's approach had a profound impact on women's participation, integrating them into political activities and promoting economic independence breaking the narrative of sex-based biases. His vision subtly challenged patriarchal norms, advocating for women's agency and participation in public life. Ultimately, Gandhi's influence on women's roles in the Indian liberation movement remains a complex and multifaceted phenomenon wherein also in the annals of anti-colonial movements, distinguished by its pioneering adoption of non-violence and ahimsa as guiding philosophical principles. A salient feature of this movement was the unprecedented mobilization of Indian women, who transcended traditional domestic roles to assume multifaceted roles in the nationalist struggle. "The division of the spheres of work being recognized, the general qualities and culture required are practically the same for both the sexes ^[1]."

My contribution to the great problem lies in my presenting for acceptance Truth and Ahimsa in every walk of life, whether for individuals or nations. I have hugged the hope that in this woman will be the unquestioned leader and, having thus found her place in human evolution, she will shed her inferiority complex. I have suggested in these columns that woman is the incarnation of Ahimsa. Ahimsa means infinite love, which again means infinite capacity for suffering...And she will occupy her proud position by the side of man as his mother, maker and silent leader. It is given to her to teach the art of peace to the warring world thirsting for that nectar. She can be the leader in Satyagraha which does not require the learning that books give but does require the stout heart that comes from suffering and faith ^[2] ... This above passage reflects Gandhi's profound philosophy on the role of women in society, symbolizing the nurturing spirit of humanity, and the importance of non-violence (Ahimsa) and truth. He emphasizes that the qualities and culture required for both men and women are practically the same, and that women can be leaders in promoting Ahimsa and truth. Gandhi views women as incarnations of Ahimsa, highlighting their capacity for infinite love and suffering.

Women's participation was characterized by diverse forms of engagement, both within and beyond the domestic sphere. Within their homes, women contributed to the movement through activities such as spinning and weaving khadi, imparting education to other women, and creating nationalist literature. They also provided clandestine support to leaders evading British authorities. In the public domain, women organized processions, convened meetings, participated in satyagraha, and endured police brutality. Notably, when male leaders were incarcerated, women assumed leadership roles, providing strategic guidance to the movement.

This collective participation marked a paradigmatic shift in Indian history, challenging entrenched social norms and empowering women to emerge as agents of change. The legacy of the independence movement continues to resonate across generations, underscoring the efficacy of collective action and non-violent resistance in effecting transformative social and political change. According to Thapar (1993) ^[11], women played a pivotal role in India's nationalist movement, actively participating in various forms of protest and activism outside their homes. They organized Prabhateris, processions to local temples singing patriotic songs, and held meetings and demonstrations to galvanize public support. Women's involvement also extended to participating in satyagraha, picketing shops selling foreign goods, and facing imprisonment and police brutality. Notably, when male leaders were incarcerated, women assumed leadership positions, guiding the movement forward with their strategic involvement.

Reframing Women's Roles: Gandhi's Impact on Indian Nationalism:

The early twentieth century marked a significant shift in the perception of the 'new woman' in India, with evolving notions of femininity and motherhood influenced by the changing political landscape. As the nationalist movement gained momentum, Indian society began to reassess its stance on gender issues. The arrival of Mahatma Gandhi on the political scene in the 1920s had a profound impact on women's roles, introducing revolutionary ideas that challenged traditional norms (Thapar, 1993) ^[11]. Gandhi's perspective on women's participation in the nationalist movement emphasized their potential beyond domestic confines. While acknowledging gender-specific roles, he critiqued practices that oppressed women, such as purdah, dowry, and the devadasi tradition, advocating for change and empowerment. This marked a pivotal moment in redefining women's roles in Indian society, paving the way for their increased participation in the struggle for independence. He believed that Indian women embodied qualities like self-sacrifice and silent suffering, making them well-suited for participation in his non-violent movement. He saw women as pivotal to the success of his philosophy, rooted in ahimsa (non-violence in thought, word, and deed) and satyagraha. As he noted, "If non-violence is the law of our being, the future is with women" (Young India, 15.12.21), highlighting the potential for women to drive positive change through peaceful means ^[3]. Mahatma promoted self-sufficiency by encouraging individuals to weave their own cloth and boycott foreign textiles, thereby fostering economic independence. Building on their domestic expertise, women contributed to the nationalist movement through spinning and weaving khadi, a traditional skill that aligned with their family roles. As Sarladevi Sarabhai, a key figure in the movement, noted, her motivation for joining stemmed from a desire to fulfill her dharma ^[4]. Moreover, the charkha, or spinning wheel, was a potent symbol of resistance against colonial rule, embodying Gandhi's Constructive Programme and its emphasis on self-reliance. He believed that poverty resulted in moral deterioration & charkha wanted to help the homeless and marginalized ^[5]. The extensive participation of women in the Indian nationalist movement constitutes a significant aspect of historical inquiry. A nuanced examination reveals diverse forms of engagement, ranging from active participation in public protests to supportive roles behind the scenes. Notably, women's involvement in the salt satyagraha exemplifies their collective resistance against colonial policies, as they defied British salt laws by manufacturing salt from seawater.

Furthermore, Gandhi's strategic deployment of women in picketing campaigns targeting liquor and foreign cloth shops underscores their symbolic meaning & integral role in the movement. Through non-violent resistance, women leveraged social pressure to dissuade customers from patronizing these establishments, often drawing upon shared caste affiliations to enhance the efficacy of their efforts. This tactical approach highlights the complex interplay between social dynamics and nationalist mobilization.

Conclusion

Summarising it, it can be said that this paper examines Mr. Gandhi's pioneering philosophical framework on women's empowerment and gender equality, which remains a profound influence on India's feminist movement. Through a critical analysis of his writings and activism, this paper highlights Gandhi's strategic deployment of semiotics to challenge patriarchal norms, advocating for women's education, rights, and opportunities.

Gandhi's advocacy for women's education was a cornerstone of his discourse, evident in his writings in Young India and Harijan. He championed social reforms, including the abolition of child marriage and the dowry system, and advocated for women's property rights. The perspectives of associates like Kasturba Gandhi, Sarojini Naidu, and Kamala Devi Chattopadhyay significantly shaped Gandhi's thoughts on women's empowerment.

Gandhi's concept of non-violence and ahimsa posited women as paradigmatic practitioners, instrumental in catalysing social change. His discourse on women's empowerment played a pivotal role in the Indian National Movement, challenging traditional patriarchal norms and stereotypes that relegated women to subordinate roles. Instead, Gandhi recognized women's agency and strength, seeking to empower them as active participants in shaping India's future.

By promoting women's economic, social, and political participation, Gandhi's approach to empowerment was multifaceted. He redefined women's roles in Indian society, acknowledging their potential as agents of change and exemplars of sacrifice and non-violence which will inspire the generation to come.

Reference

1. Gandhi, 1954, 57.
2. Gandhi, 1954, 57.
3. Young India, 15.12.21.
4. Agnew, 1979, 56.
5. Hind, 2024, 324.
6. Agnew V. Elite women in Indian politics. Delhi: Vikas Publications, 1979.
7. Gandhi M. The collected works of Mahatma Gandhi. Ahmedabad: Navajivan, 1971, 43.
8. Chatterjee P. The nationalist resolution of the women's question. In Sangari K, Vaid S, editors. Recasting women: Essays in Indian colonial history. Delhi: Kali for Women, 1989.
9. Gandhi M. Women and social injustice. Ahmedabad: Navajivan Publishing House, 1942.
10. Gandhi MK. Sarvodaya (welfare for all). Kumarappa B, editor. Ahmedabad: Navajivan Publishing House, 1954.
11. Thapar S. Women as activists; women as symbols: A study of the Indian nationalist movement. Feminist Review,1993;44:81–96.
<https://www.jstor.org/stable/1395197>
12. Gandhi MK. Hind swaraj. Ahmedabad: Navajivan Publishing House, 1909.
13. Parekh B. Gandhi's political philosophy: A critical examination. London: Macmillan, 1989.
14. Hind VK. Gandhi and national spirit: Understanding through symbols. In Gupta P, editor. Gandhi: Ideology, philosophy and Indian politics. Delhi: Pustak Bharati (Books-India), 2024.
15. Habib I. Gandhi and the national movement. Social Scientist,1995;23(4/6):315.
16. Kishwar M. Gandhi on women. Economic and Political Weekly,1985;20(40):1691–1702.